

Canada's reaction in 1914 is very different compared to 2001's reaction towards war. These men were not sad at or worried at all about going to war. Instead, their reaction toward war was very cheerful and exciting. They were hoping for war to happen because they think that god will guide them through war. They were very young and religious men. Most men there were white men. They sang songs about God saving the king and Christian soldiers. They didn't really understand much about war and the impact that would have caused on their lives because the newspapers didn't discuss it. Poverty influenced them to become positive about war because it became their source of income.

The changes from 1914 to 2001 changed dramatically. In 2001, there was mix of men and women that went against war. Most of them were youth that wanted peace and didn't want war to happen. They created signs that say stop violence. People in 2001 know how bad war can be and they understand the consequences in war and don't want to lose lives and money on war and equipments. Canadians in 2001 had a good understanding and knowledge of how war affected the community as a whole. The community was diverse and by declaring war on one country, it would be singling out one part of society that didn't want to be discriminated against because of what was going on in their home country.
